J. A. FYFE

Portrait by J. E. Miller

Monsieur le Directeur.

je remercie la Commission d'avoir Bien voulu me mettre au nombre des artistes qui doivent concourir à l'exécution de la statue de Colbert mais la fortune m'a toujours été si contraire dans ces sortes de luttes que je n'ose me décider à la tenter de nouveau dans cette circonstance.

Veuillez Bien Monsieur le Directeur avec l'expression de mes regrets recevoir l'assurance de mes sentiments respectueux.

ANTOINE-LOUIS BARYE.

A NOTE BY M. LÉON BONNAT.

(From the Gazette des Beaux Arts.)

* * * I NEVER saw BARYE, but I have, nevertheless, always truly worshipped him.

BARYE has been, and still is, one of my idols.

How often have I been at the Luxembourg, only to see his "Jaguar devouring a Hare" !

How many times have I traversed the Tuileries to gaze upon the paw of his "Lion and Serpent"—that tragic paw so wonderfully analyzed and modelled !

BARYE seldom spoke of himself. I have read biographies written by men who knew him well, who held his talent—I should say his genius—in the utmost veneration, and rightly so. They gave many details concerning his works, of his manner of living and working, of his general character; but not one of them could reveal the true secret of his inspiration, or tell from what source he drew his genius. He was taciturn, uncommunicative, observant, and, as I well know, devoted wholly to his art, passionately revering it, and analyzing, measuring, dissecting, and studying incessantly the anatomy and proportions of his models. That I know, and that is true science—the wonderful science that helped him to produce so many chefs d'œuvre, and which is not to be under-estimated.

But that of which I am ignorant, which I would like, above all, to know, is, what transpired in his soul. Whence originated this instinctive knowledge of wild animals, this divination of savage power, unerring in its force, this fascination for the mighty shapes, which move so majestically, so nobly, in their enduring strength? At what moment of his life did this great man, who commenced as an apprentice to a steel engraver, a simple metal chaser, discover within himself the noble sentiment which guided his power and genius? To what did he owe the conception, the revelation of this beauty, which brings man nearer to his God, and makes of him almost a creator? * * *

Failing the actual knowledge which would inform us when his genius first manifested itself, a knowledge in which almost all the biographies of celebrated men are deficient, let us not lose ourselves in useless conjecture, but be content with the facts which have been demonstrated. Thus, from his own words, we know that being "keenly tormented by his intense desire to become a sculptor," he entered the studio of BOSIO, where, it appears, nevertheless, he did not remain any length of time, since we soon afterwards find him with GROS. What led him to seek instruction from a painter? Was he attracted thither by a certain affinity of thought? Was it from this GROS, he who painted the "Bataille d'Eylau," that he drew his love for the heroic which later inspired him to the creation of "The-seus and the Centaur" ? Rather, may it not be to the Assyrians and Egyptians, whose works he so venerated, and whose works, as well as the Etruscan vases, he never ceased, even in his old age, to contemplate and study,—may it not be, I repeat, to the influence of the old masters that we ought to assign the inspiration of his talent ?

However pronounced may be the originality of an artist, however profound, which is decidedly the term to employ in speaking of BARYE, it is very difficult, even to one possessing the utmost perspicacity, to discover how much belongs to his own personality, and how much has been borrowed from his predecessors. Look at RAPHAEL, for instance : he may copy, study his surroundings, become inspired by what he sees and what he believes to be greater than himself, yet he still remains the painter of grace and youth. Would MICHAEL-ANGELO, the Great, have painted the Sistine Chapel without SIGNORELLI ? The greatest of all artists, though he were, would he have invented alone these Titanic groups ? And without looking so high or so far, and taking more recent examples, would our celebrated school of artists have had its present renown and prestige without CONSTABLE ? The problem is a difficult one to solve, and is, perhaps, outside of the limits of this article.

Besides, it is not BARYE as a sculptor of the human form whom we have under consideration, however admirable may be his group of "Theseus and the Centaur," however graceful the superb grouping of "Roger and Angelica." What does concern us is that in which he is absolutely unique, that which did not exist before him, that which he has conveyed with the skill of a great master, which is and will remain his unquestioned and unquestionable glory. The animal, the true animal, living, roused, tragic, passionate, quivering, ferocious, cruel, fierce, and apprehensive, calm in his power, sure of his suppleness, of his speed, of the strength of his jaws, and the unerring aim of his blow. This is the subject upon which I would have liked to converse with BARYE. To know whence this love, so true, deep, and intense, originated.

Those who knew him said he had in his features, in the squareness of his jaw, in the expression of his lips, and the form of his mouth, something akin to the tawny beasts he sculptured. * * * *
He was reticent, I know, and must have been somewhat cold and excessively reserved, and had the slightly scornful and haughty demeanor which is characteristic of many great men who are but imperfectly understood. His emotions were deep and underlying, as are those of the truly great. Those of others never go beyond the surface.

What a wonderful observer, what a sagacious mind, and what an analyst! What extraordinary instinct, what admirable intuition of the animal! Whether he modelled a deer, a serpent, an eagle, or a tiger, he conveyed them faithfully, characteristically, in their smallest details. Nothing escaped his notice.

* * * They tell me BARYE loved Barbizon. There were his quiet walks in the forest, solitary promenades, where he rested from the wearing life of Paris, where he encountered his graceful models and mastered the details of their most unpremeditated movements and fleeting expressions.

But the timid and shy were only a pastime for him, and it was not in creating them that he gave full scope to the intensity of his genius. It was the warring of savage animals that this great enthusiast demanded, the carnivorous animals ; the poisonous jungle, the forests of thorny mimosas, where he could study the king of the forest in his lair, with his heaving flanks and tawny mane, lit up by two lurid sparks. He required the spectacle of elephants crushing tigers, gigantic serpents darting with the rapidity of lightning upon the passing antelope to suffocate it in their terrible coils, the lioness on a rocky height scenting the air, her powerful muscles contracted, ready to spring upon her prey, or the huge elephants of antediluvian races, crossing plains and mountains under a fiery sun, and destroying everything in their ponderous passage. These were the scenes which made the paradise of BARYE, this the world wherein his imagination loved to dwell, his true kingdom, his beyond all dispute.

And no one before him knew how to wield the sceptre. No one before him knew how to interpret the unconscious strength of the lion, with his massive carriage, or the cunning and the cruel ferocity of the tiger and the jaguar.

Look at his group in the Tuileries. A lion is passing, a boa-constrictor bars his way, the terrible paw descends, and while the serpent, held as within a vice, writhes with agony, and in a final supreme effort, in the death throes, tries to defend itself, the powerful beast remains unmoved before his treacherous foe; hardly does he deign to turn his gigantic head and only slightly erects his mane. Now and then he responds with a low growl to the sibilant hisses of his despairing enemy. But the paw executes, that wonderful paw, and all is there embodied. Admire it,—the hair turned backward to allow the claws, those terrible weapons, to penetrate unhindered, to move back and forth in their sheaths, and, sharp as daggers, they have only to close and uncloze, and all will have been told, the tragedy enacted.

* * * But out of all this world of savage animals to which BARYE owed so many of his chefs-d'œuvre it is rather upon the tiger and its species, the jaguars and panthers, that I would bestow the palm. Look, for instance, at his "Walking Tiger"; it is simply a marvel.

In my younger days I have been at the menagerie, and there, drawn to and held by the beauty of these great creatures, I have remained for many hours, watching the huge felines pace mechanically the floors of their too narrow prisons. The heavy paw doubles with admirable suppleness, the shoulder-blades rise and fall, the limbs move with an ease full of grace and harmony. One is fascinated, charmed, and remains riveted to the spot in a state of unreflecting contemplation. If a dog passes near the grating, the beast stops abruptly, raises its great head, the burning eyes fixed upon the animal, until the latter disappears, when the emotion subsides, the purposeless pacing is resumed, the fire dies out of the eyes, and the tiger lies down, or yawns with weariness, exposing its gleaming teeth.

Pitiful, great prisoners, created to range over limitless space, to live under tropical suns in untrammelled freedom, and who so wretchedly exist here in the mists of Paris and the fogs of the North!

The apprentice metal chaser must have often played truant to spend some hours of contemplation here, pressing against the iron bars of the grating, and, perhaps, his heart throbbing at the revelation of beauty with the presentiment that the day would come when he would struggle with these proud models. And he was true to his convictions—and from the conflict came forth a conqueror. Look at his tiger! Everything is so wonderfully depicted in it; the proportions, the suppleness of the limbs, the grandeur of movement, the carriage of the head, the size and development of the jaws, the shagginess of the hair and the half-closed eyes. It is perfect and it is admirable. And if from the tiger BARYE passes to the panther, he must represent it in ambush, or springing upon a deer, and how admirable is not it also ! The panther springs and pounces with its whole weight, and with unerring precision, upon its victim and seizes it with its formidable teeth. The great paws spread widely apart, one upon the withers and the other upon the forehead, and in addition to these terrible weapons, the ferocious beast avails itself of its weight to arrest and paralyze the frightened animal, which, overcome by force, crushed by its tormentor, bows its head, and quivering, bathed in the sweat of death, utters a cry of supreme agony.

I come now to the "Jaguar devouring a Hare." I believe that in the opinion of all it is the work of works of this man who has produced so many. It is as fine as the "Esclave" of MICHAEL ANGELO at the Louvre. With his mouth the jaguar has seized the hare by the entrails ; the right paw is thrust forward, his nails lacerate the abdomen of the victim, and slowly, crouched to the earth, grovelling like a snake, he goes to devour the hare in the obscurity of his den. He anticipates his feast with intensely ferocious joy, "avec la volupté gourmande du sang," as EDMOND DE GONCOURT says in his able description of the jaguar. His ears are laid back against his neck, the great muscles of which denote strength. Nervous tremors run along the length of his spine to the last vertebra of his tail ;

the savage eyes converging to the centre have the horrible fixity of the eye of a viper. Woe to him who should attempt to rob him of his prey ! There breathes from this wonderful bronze thus conceived and executed an atmosphere of ferocity and savageness that is extraordinary. It is genius.

BARYE is one of the greatest artists of the age, I may even say of all the ages. If I had a comparison to make I should think of BALZAC. BARYE has understood the animal and conveyed it with a power equal to that which BALZAC has manifested in those passionate researches in which he has so powerfully interpreted the heart of man. Both have left their ineffaceable stamp upon the world. There may be others who could do as well, but I doubt it ; none could ever excel.

NOTE.

Dimensions are given in inches. The height includes the bronze base, and length, the extreme points of the object. The first figures indicate the height, the second the length.

EXCEPTION.—The height and width of the bronze plate is given for the bas-reliefs.

CONTEMPORARIES AND FRIENDS OF

NOTE.

THE great names in the art of the XIXth century in France are those of the men who were the contemporaries and friends of BARYE. They are described as the phalanx of 1830, a period of revolution in which they wrought unconsciously, but with infinite power. They were COROT, DAUBIGNY, DIAZ, DECAMPS, DUPRÉ, DELACROIX, MILLET, ROUSSEAU, TROYON, and GÉRICAUT. When it was decided to hold an exhibition of BARYE's works in New York, in aid of the project to erect a monument to his memory in Paris, it was thought not inappropriate that it should be made to include a selection of the works of the men who were his contemporaries, his fellow-students, his friends, his pupils, his teachers. These great men all learned each of the other something, and they were the earliest to discern the genius of BARYE. They understood and revered his art, and in his turn BARYE understood them, toiled with them, suffered with them, and lived to exult in all their triumphs. He, later than any other, achieved the worldly measure of success, and if he lingered unrewarded until nearly all his colleagues had passed away, it seems, perhaps, fitting that they should now appear to do him honor and to contribute to his fame. They are well represented. Nowhere else in the world could such a collection be made as that which now supplements the exhibition of the works of BARYE. No like opportunity to assemble them was ever presented, and it is not probable that such another will again occur. In the gravitation to America of great works of art a majority of the treasures of the great French school have been acquired. The choicest of them are among the hundred pictures now displayed, and the occasion for the study of the works of these great artists is one of which the like never before was known. The liberal spirit and the unhesitating generosity of the American collectors of pictures are beyond ordinary comprehension, and have made this exhibition possible.
